League Works for Improved Schools

Parents Would Cut Down Number of Students Per Teacher, Form Social Centers, and Promote Sanitation.

Much ink and many words have been expended on the Washingtor public school system. "Knockers" have brandished their hammers treely; not many heads have escaped.

In an effort to get at facts and learn about conditions at first hand. several District organizations have been making inquiries into varying phases of school conditions.

These bodies have given the results of their work to The Times. Many of the reforms advocated can not be effected for some time. But the information obtained is enlightening, and when it does come for concerted action, the public will be in a better position to fight for school improvement, from knowing the information these workers have

That is The Times' reason for publishing a series of articles from these investigators, many of them representing well-known civic bodies.
